THE London Journal

SATURDAY, October 6. 1722.

To the Author of the London Journal.

SIR,

I HAVE already often acknowledged, and I shall always go on to contend for it, That there is nothing more abject, or more unworthy of a Free-born Subject, and especially of Any who have a Right to vote in Parliament, than a servile Submission to the Dictates of Great Men in Power. On the other Hand, I will as freely and as strongly maintain, That the carrying an Opposition to Them to that Extremity, which some of late have appear'd to do, is equally irreconcileable with the Character of a True Patriot; is always unjustifiable upon all the Principles of Duty to the Publick; and at some Critical Junctures, may prove absolutely fatal to that Country, which it professes to serve and save. We may see an Instance of This in what has pass'd throughout this last Summer, and is now most talk'd of amongst us: I mean, the Behaviour of Many, (whose Zeal for their Country, if you will believe them, outstrips that of All their Neighbours,) with regard to Plots and Conspiracies; and particularly, to the Conduct of Those in the Administration about That which at present alarms the World. A Behaviour, I must own, which has often made me congratulate the Profest Enemies of our Country, upon their peculiar Happiness, in having Others so ready, so watchful, so unwearied in propagating all their Stories, and doing all their Work for them. For this is in Truth the Case.

Those in the Administration are the Persons to whom the first Intelligencies of Danger naturally come: And Those must, in the Nature of Things, be receiv'd and consider'd, before it is possible, or fitting, for Others to know any Thing of them. Upon such Advices, supposing them Real, what is it the Duty of Ministers to do? And to suppose them not Real, before the farther opening of the Matter, no one can pretend to be supportable by any Argument. Upon such Advices, I say, could They have been justify'd to their Master, or to their Country, if They did not immediately put the Kingdom into the best State of Defence, the Laws of the Land, and the Nature of the Thing, could permit? Nay, would they not have been Criminal and Detestable, if They had not? This, therefore, they do. They profess, They have such Advices of undoubted Credit. They get together, in several Places, what Armed Force is by Act of Parliament appointed to subsist in the Nation, and put it into as good a Condition for the Common Defence, as They can; and this an Armed Force kept up for this very Purpose, by the Consent of the People; and with this very View alone, of being that call'd together, and thus rendered useful, in Cases of such Emergency. Those Forces are wholly unnecessary, unless upon Supposition of Danger: and for Time of Danger alone, were They therefore confirmed to, and appointed. This being then the Case; what would one expect in return to this, and especially from Those who profess even the Coolest Friendship to the present Establishment? At least, one would have hoped for a little Patience, a little Expectation for a while only, till Matters opened, till it come to appear whether the Danger was Real or Fictitious? But, no such Favour, it seems, was to be expected from Some. For even before the Profest Enemies themselves could recover their Surprize at the Discovery of what They thought undiscoverable; or give out their Proper Words of Ridicule; Profest Friends themselves were ready to begin the Game. Nay, I quickly found that This was to be made one essential Mark of Patriotism; and He was from this Moment not to be accounted a Patriot, who had not this infallible Mark of it in his Mouth; and was not ready to join in sneering, and turning into Pleasantry, all Discourses of Plots and Treasons. And from Mirth and Merriment, the Passage was easy and natural to Satyr and Invective. In Some of the Common Writings, Standing Armies presently became a Topick of Railing, even to Those who could not but have Sense enough to see, that there was not a Soldier more than what was allow'd by Parliament; not One more than what was actually a Member of the Army before the calling of them together; nor any One New Circumstance to justify that odious Word. But so it must be. Standing Armies, Encampments, Reviews, Mock-Plots, Imaginary Conspiracies, were found to be sounding Words, excellently adapted to work up an angry Period, and to make Railing and Rage popular.

If from the Common Papers, you went to the Places of Publick Resort, you would find the Effect of such Lessons: One shrugging his Shoulders, —— Another shaking his Head, —— a Third lamenting the Fate of his Country, —— a Fourth railing in a very high Tone, —— and a Fifth answering you with nothing but a Laugh, if you seem'd only to beg a short Truce, and a little Patience: And all this, not from any Concern at the Designs of their Enemies, and their own Destruction from that Quarter; but at the too great Care taken to guard Them against it.

I ventured to enter a little with One of them into the Argument: And when his Fire was almost spent, and He began to cool, I beg'd of Him only to answer me the few following Questions, without Prejudice or Passion. Are the Ministers at present in such a Situation, as to play with an angry World? Or does their present Condition make it probable, They would voluntarily raise up a New Scene of Virulent Opposition, to be added to the Difficulties that surround Them already? Can you think Them so void of Common Sense, as not to see that such a Fiction must at the End do Them infinitely more Hurt, than any pretext Good can possibly countervail? Nay, that it must tend to their own Destruction? Supposing it a Mock-Plot, as you call it; an invented Machine for some By-purpose; will it not be Time enough to call Them to Account severely for it, when it shall be examin'd, and appear so to be? I promise you then to join with you, not in laughing, but in something more to the Purpose, and more becoming an Injur'd Nation. But supposing it a True One, and their Advices too Certain; what Reparation can you make your Country, for turning into Ridicule that Care of the Publick Safety, without which we are all undone? What Mischief could you do, greater than this, to that Country you pretend so much to love? And, I pray, what should make you think otherwise? Can you deny it to be possible, Can you deny it to be probable, that the Enemy should take the Advantage of your own Supposed, Enemies, and Incredulity on their Part; and of your Rage and Credulity, and Readiness to swallow and propagate every thing on the other Part, against Those who are at the Helm, and who alone therefore have it in their Power to guard against those Enemies? And if it were only possible, nay probable, that Those artful Enemies are now laying some Design to bear; is not This Argument enough to a Britain, and a Protestant, to delay his Jokes, and postpone his Wit and Satyr, till it appears that an Administration has been wicked enough, or foolish enough, to act the Part you suspect? But if it be a Real Design, what would Those Ministers think of you, or what Fate would be too hard for Them, who could neglect the Defence of their Country, for fear of the Scowling or Frown of your Offended? If this be your Love to your Country; if this be your Patriotism; take it all, and keep it all amongst you, ——— I desire none of it. The Word is becoming nauseous; and will be brought, by these Methods, to be what I shall be sorry to find it, a Contemptible Sound, Disgustful to all Men of Sense.

I found the Gentleman Something startled, and cool enough to suffer me to go on, in this Manner. For God's sake, Is there no Measure in humane Affairs, no Medium to be hoped for in Mankind, when once they are set a going? Certainly there is a middle Way to be found between the base Extreme of yielding your selves Captive to Men in Power, and the other as dangerous Extreme of treating them upon All Points in such a Manner. Your Fate is indeed hard, if you are expected to be in the former Extreme: But Their Fate is as hard, (and Yours in Theirs at the End) if you too make it impossible for them to act Any Way, without laying themselves open to such Reproaches and Imputations.

Take the Affair before us, and try the Absurdity of such a Proceeding. If Those in Power, upon their best Advices of Danger, act a careful Part, and enter into Measures of securing you; presently the Outcry is, Standing Armies, Mock-Plots, Tricks to get more Money;——tho', by the way, every Demand of Money is a Weight upon themselves, and a Blow to their own Interest. On the other Hand, if they indulge you in your present easy Humour, and in that Imagination of Security, in which you wrap yourselves; and when they have it in their Power to guard you, leave you naked and defenceless; and Danger invades you, and any desperate Stroke be struck;—— Then, what is too bad for such Ministers? Was it not their peculiar Care and Province to guard the Nation against all probable Danger? against every the least Appearance of Evil? Were not our few Forces kept up by our own willing Consent for this Purpose only? Are not two Degrees of Care too much, far better than One too little? If the Curses of Us and our Posterity can be of any Force, Those Ministers, who can thus neglect their Country, will be miserable in Life, and after Death their Memories detested. This would be then your Outcry, and too deservedly. But in the mean while, I repeat it again, Don't make it impossible for Them to act, by trifling them in Effect, That which Way soever They conduct themselves, you will equally expose them to Popular Reproach and Indignation. Before you have the least Reason to think amiss of the Part they are acting, let them not incur the Odium of the vilest Behaviour; and cease at least a little from abusing Them, at a Time when perhaps They are meriting your Thanks. Such a Behaviour, upon so hazardous and terrible a Conjuncture, has often brought to my Mind the Saying, Quos Jupiter vult perdere, prius dementat: Those whom God is resolved to destroy, He first infatuates. Never any thing look'd more like It, than your present Temper. And the Time, One would fear, is come, for the terrible Accomplishment of this Sentence, when You, who, I am perswaded, mean well to the present Establishment, not only resolve to shut your Eyes against the Appearance of any possible Danger your selves; but spend your idle Hours in ridiculing and outraging Those, who guard you from it; making it, by this means, much more hazardous for any at the Helm to attempt to prevent your Destruction, than for any Traytor to contrive and execute it; and raising such a Ferment about you, that one would imagine, from the Discourse of many, That the Ministers are to be tried for being so officious in defending the Publick; and not the Conspirators for their Treason against it. If it be so ungracious a Work; nay, so unpardonable an Office, to prevent the Cutting of your Throats, there will be but little Encouragement to do it: and there may come Those in time, who will not merit your Anger by so provoking an Office, at the Expence of their own Quiet and Reputation. In a Word, I foresee, and foretell nothing but Total Ruin from such a Behaviour——This is the Substance of what I then urged.

We are now come nearer to the Opening of that Affair. And let every Man, who has treated so critical and important a Matter in a Manner so unbecoming Persons of Sense, and so unworthy of Englishmen, lay his Hand upon his Heart, and think how best to make amends to his Country, for the Injury he has done it by such a Proceeding; by tearing out of the Hands of Those in Power, almost all Possibility of saving the Nation; and entirely depriving Them of all Encouragement to attempt it: And if He now sees his Ill Fate upon it clearly as Him, let Him publickly acknowledge that Others were doing their Duty, whilst He was treating Them as the worst of Men.

But let not any such Intemperate Unquicable Proceeding bring a Disgrace upon the Greatest and most necessary Virtues. True Patriotism disdains all such Methods. It is upon Seeing, and observes the Motions of That point upon Seeing, and observes the Motions of That point upon Seeing, and observes the Motions of That point he will think himſelf obliged to confeſs every Thing. His Wife is brought up to Town from Dover, and is now in Cuſtody of a Meſſenger.
